The Persians say, that four of the principal genii made war upon Tāhmūrās, the third king of the Pēshdādian dynasty, by whom however they were defeated, and imprisoned in frightful caverns; on which account that prince is called in history and romance ديور بند dīw-band, the chainer of demons. In the Chronicle of Abū Jafar, there is a tradition, that God created the Genii or Dīves long before Adam, and gave them the world to rule over for 7000 years: after which, the sovereignty was vested in the Parīs and Dīves for 2000 years more, under their sole monarch Jān bin Jān: but these beings disobeying the mandates of God, Iblīs (the devil), then an ethereal angel, was sent from heaven to chastise and govern them; when, being joined by a considerable party of malecontents, he gave battle to Jān bin Jān, whom he totally routed, and became in his room absolute sovereign of the earth. Intoxicated, however, with his dignity, Iblīs forgot that he was inferior to Omnipotence: to humble him, therefore, man was created, and the proud angel commanded to obey him; but refusing, he was cursed by God, and doomed to everlasting torment. From this stubborn disobedience, it is added, he was named Ibā, The Refractory; Iblīs, The Desperate; and Shaytān, The Proud; his original name having been Hāris, the Guardian or Protector. دیو آباد dīw-ābād, Possessed by the devil, a demoniac. دیو دین dīw-i dīn, Satan. دیو سپید dīw-i sapēd, Satan transformed into an angel of light. ذ ذ zāl, The ninth letter of the Arabic alphabet, denoting in arithmetic 700. In the almanacks, it is used as a contraction for the last month of the Arabian year, ذوالحجّة zū'l hijjat; as ذا zā is the character used for ذوالقعدة zū'l ka'adat, The penultimate month. Scarcely more than one or two words in the Persian language begin with this letter, though it is occasionally found in the middle of a Persian word, as in پذیرفتن pazīraftan, گذاشتن guzashtan, and the like. In the middle of words it is sometimes confounded with ذ dāl, as پدر pazar and پدر padar, A father. Its legitimate sound was perhaps somewhat like th in that; but the Persians make but little, if any difference between it and ز zā.

ر rē or rā, The tenth letter of the Arabic alphabet, and the twelfth of the Persian. In arithmetic it expresses 200; in almanacks it is the astronomical character for the moon; and in dates it denotes the month الآخر ربيع rabīʿ al ākhir. This letter is interchangeable with د dāl, ز zē, ژ zhē, ل lām, and ن nūn.

ر rā, An inseparable particle added to Persian nouns, generally serving to denote the oblique cases. It marks the accusative when the word is used definitely; as گل را چید gul-rā chīd, "He gathered the rose." It may occasionally be construed by the particle to, the English sign of the dative; as چون قصای الهی chūn kazā-i ilahī nuzūl yābad, dida-i basīrat rā nuh rōshanī mānad, "When the decrees of heaven are accomplishing, no light remains to the eye of understanding." By the word for; as خدا را یک نظر ای سرور khudā rā yak nazar ay sarw-i āzād, "For God's sake, one look, O waving cypress!" درد عاشق را دواي بهتر از معشوق dard-i ʿāshikrā dawā-i behtar az maʿshūk nīst, "There is no remedy for a lover's pain better than his beloved." It denotes possession, in such sentences as this: او را ده رأس اسب ōrā dah ras-i asp būd, "He had, or possessed ten head of horses." If rā occurs sometimes with a genitive signification, it is but seldom, and without good authority; and in the best authors it is often omitted, and frequently redundant. Rā, contracted from the Arabic رأي ra-y, signifies, Seeing, as روشن را rōshan-rā, Seeing light, i. e. penetrating, wise. وزرای نیک را uzarā-i nīk-rā, Prudent vazīrs, or counsellors.

 رمضان ramazān, (pl. رمضانات ramazānāt or رمضانون ramazānūn), The ninth month of the Muhammadan year; during which their prophet has enjoined a fast of the most rigorous kind; all good Muslims being interdicted from eating, drinking, and conjugal duty, from the rising of the sun till the appearance of the stars; the sick, the traveller, the soldier in the field, and others, whose situation will not permit so strict an observation of it, being obliged to fast a complete month when their health and circumstances will allow. The word Ramazān implies a consuming fire; whence it is by some conjectured, that this month was formerly stationary in the most sultry period of the summer, and not revolving through all the seasons, as at present, in consequence of the Muhammadan year being universally lunar.
 The Ramazān is greatly revered on many accounts, but particularly from the belief, that it was on the 27th of this month, called ليلة القدر laylatu'l kadr (the night of power) that the Kur'ān began to descend from heaven; on the anniversary of which all orthodox Muhammadans continue most fervently in prayer, imagining that every petition then put up to Omnipotence will be favourably received. Ramazān is also one of the attributes of God, as the pardoner, and likewise the consumer of sinners.

 Sand shining, or scorched by the reflection of the sun.

Several Persian writers attribute the commencement of the epocha of their solar year to king Jam, who having finished the city, named by the Greeks Persepolis, (by the Persians Istakhar, Praise of the Sun, or Chihalmānār, Forty Pillars), instituted this day, when the sun enters Aries, in honour of his first public entry. See sāl. It is likewise called hamal, naw rōz-i hamal, The new day of the ram, to distinguish it from naw rōz-i mīzān, The new day of the balance; a festival which is celebrated when the sun, at the autumnal equinox, enters Libra, in commemoration of an important victory, said to have been gained on that day by Faridūn, son of Jam (another celebrated king of the old Persians) over the Arabian usurper Zabāk, who had dethroned his father. See Faridūn. Though Naw rōz no longer continues to begin the Persian year, being obliged, as Muhammadans, to adopt the lunar computation, they still distinguish those ancient festivals with extraordinary rejoicing.

 سال سال sāl dar sāl, From year to year. دیگر سال sāl-i digar, The next year, the year to come. Another year. سال قحط sāl-i kaht, A year barren for want of rain. The epoch of the Persian solar year is of very high antiquity, their historians and astronomers generally carrying it up to Jam or Jamshēd (see جم) above 800 years before the Christian era. It consists of twelve months, of thirty days each, five days more being added to a particular month to make the number in all 365. For some time there was no embolism, similar to our leap-year; in consequence of which, their Naw rōz, or new-year's day, originally fixed at the vernal equinox when the sun enters Aries, unavoidably made a retrograde progression into Pisces; to remedy which, at the end of every 120 years, a month was intercalated, and celebrated with the greatest festivity all over the kingdom.
 This month, at the end of the first period, followed Farwardīn (March); at the second celebration it was placed after Ardibe-hisht (April); and on the third it succeeded Khurdād (May); the five ascititious days being always annexed to it. In this rotation it continued till the year 636 of the Christian era, when Yazdaghird III., the last king of the Sassanian dynasty, being defeated and dethroned by the Arabians, Persia became a province of the great empire of the Khalīfs; and the Muhammadan lunar computation being introduced in all civil and religious affairs, the intercalations of the solar year were from that period neglected, till 1079, when the Seljukian sultan of Persia, Malikshāh Jalāl-eddīn (Amīru'l Umarā to the khalīf Muktaḍī) reformed the calendar, which has since borne his name; bringing forward the Naw rōz from the fifteenth degree of Pisces to the first of Aries, and intercalating an embolismal day every fourth year, which was thence called کبیسه سال sāl-i kabīseh, or leap year. The astronomers, in their tables, add the five ascititious days to the last month Isfandārmuz (February); though they are vulgarly an-nexed to Abān (October), because they happened to follow that month in the intercalary rotation, at the defeat of Yazdaghird, who had made an alteration in the calendar, known by his name, which however, in consequence of that event, soon ceased to be publicly attended to. It may here be observed, that the old Persian month was not divided into weeks, every day having a distinct name taken from the angel supposed to preside over it.

Two princes of this name are much celebrated in the East, (both distinguished by the title of Zū'l karnayn, Having two horns (of the world), implying that they conquered the globe from east to west; the first supposed to be one of the most ancient kings; the other Alexander of Macedon, whom they call also Bin Filikus (son of Philip), and Rūmī (the Grecian). Some Persian historians say, however, that he was not the son of Philip, but of Dārāb (Darius), who having married a daughter of Philip, sent her back, though pregnant, because he disliked her breath; that being delivered of Alexander at her father's court, Philip educated him as his son, and, bequeathing him his crown with the secret of his birth, he laid claim to the throne of Persia, then filled by his younger brother Darius (by another mother), and supporting his pretensions with a powerful army, defeated him, and reigned as the tenth king of the Kayānian dynasty; dividing his empire on his death-bed amongst twenty-four of his principal commanders, the chief of whom they call Lagos (Ptolemy). The Tārīkhī Muntakhab relates, however, that he distributed his dominions in his life-time among the sons of those princes whom he had conquered, on the condition of their paying him homage as lord paramount, and furnishing certain quotas of troops; which terms they punctually complied with till his death, when each became independent in his feudal principality. (If there are circumstances in these Eastern details inconsistent with truth, let it be remembered that they are not more visionary than the legendary improbable fictions which swell the Greek historians). The conquests of Alexander are celebrated in many Persian, Arabic, and Turkish histories, romances, and poems, under the titles of Sikandar-nāmah (the book of Alexander), Ayin-i Iskandarī (the mirror of Alexander), Bahāristān (the mansion of the spring), &c. Hanging the head (a quadruped whose fore-legs are short). A horse apt to stumble. Standing on the head (a mountebank's trick). sikandar kh'urdan, To trip, to stumble.

There is a degree of magnificence in some of the Eastern coins, together with an elegance of fancy in the inscriptions, to which the Europeans have nothing similar. A mere accident having afforded me an opportunity some time ago of making a hasty transcript of one (struck at Delhi, A.D. 1653, in the reign of the great Mogul Shāh Jahān), which to me appeared to give weight to the above observation, I shall here insert a description of it, as it may to some perhaps be an object both of curiosity and information: it is of gold, and circular, above 70 ounces in weight, nearly four inches diameter and four lines thick; in value about 300*l*. Within the circle on each side is described a square, (the angles in contact with the periphery, in which, and in the complementary segments, are the following inscriptions.

1. Within the square on one side (in four lines).

شهاب الدین محمد صاحب
قران ثانی شاه جهان پادشاه غازی

Shihābū'd dīn Muhammad, Sāhib-kirān-i sūnī shāh jahān pādshāh ghāzī, 'The bright star of religion, Muhammad, a second Sāhib-Kirān, Shāh Jahān, the victorious emperor.' (Sāhib-Kirān is a royal title, similar to Cæsar, or Augustus. It was adopted by Tamerlane.)

2. In the segment of the circle, on the upper side of the square (in two lines).

سکه بر مهر دو صد مهري زد از لطف اله

Sikkah bar muhr-i du sad muhrī zad az lutfi 'llāh, 'The impression upon this coin, of 200 mohurs, was struck by divine favour.'

3. On the lateral segment to the left hand (in two lines).

The knot of Solomon, being two triangles interbraced. سليمان زمان Sulaymān-i zamān, The Solomon or the oracle of his age. سليمان ديوان ḡwān-i Sulaymān, The tribunal of Solomon.—No name is more famous in the east than Solomon: he succeeded his father David, according to their belief, when only twelve years old; at which age, however, Omnipotence placed under his obedience, not only mankind and animals, but even the elements, and the Genii good and bad. His throne was magnificent beyond idea, 12,000 seats of gold being arranged on the right for the patriarchs and prophets, and 12,000 on the left for men learned in every science. The birds were his constant attendants, screening him like a canopy from the inclemencies of the weather; whilst the zephyrs, wafting him wherever he wished to go, rendered horses or any earthly carriage unnecessary.—All the wonderful traditions, however, relative to Solomon, it must be observed, are not confined to the son of David. The heroic or fabulous ages of the Persians go far beyond those of the Europeans; the world, agreeably to their system, being peopled thousands of years before Adam, by etherial or igneal beings, governed by a succession of seventy-two Solomons. The supernatural powers supposed to be vested in those antedemite monarchs, as well as in the king of Judah, are figured to have been chiefly derived from the curious talismans they were said to have possessed, (to which allusions are often made, not only in their poems and romances, but even in their graver works, and in the Kur'ān itself), as the Khātim, or Muhr-i Sulīmānī, the seal of Solomon; the Tēgh-i ātīsh, or the flaming sword; the Jubāh, or the impenetrable cuirass; and the Sipar, or the shield, which last, they add, was bequeathed by Jān bin Jān, one of the antediluvian kings, to the father of mankind, who carried it to Sarandīb (Ceylon), where it was many ages afterwards discovered by Kayūmars, the first king of Persia; from whom descending to his grandson Tahmūras, it was by that prince employed so successfully in his wars with the Dīves, that he got the surname of Dīv-band, or chainer of demons. These, it may be said, are Persian tales: but let us not ridicule them; they are dignified by the Homer of Persia, Ferdūsi, in his Sulaymān-nāmah, as the mythology of the ancients was rendered important by the Homer of Greece. Every age and every nation have their fooleries; many received opinions even of modern times will not bear the touchstone of truth: and the sorcery-laws of our country were, till very recently, a far more authentic disgrace to human nature than all the wild, yet pleasing fictions of the East.

(Darius Hystaspes); when it gave way to that of the Magi, then introduced by Zardusht or Zoroaster. They believed in one God, and in the ministry of angels, or inferior deities, as represented by the stars, which became in consequence high objects of their adoration. They held many tenets in common with the Muhammadan, the Magian, the Jewish, and even the Christian religion, being by travellers called Christians of St. John, because they adopted a species of baptism. Their chief pilgrimages were to Harrān in Mesopotamia, to Mecca, and to the pyramids of Egypt, which they supposed to be the tombs of Seth, and his sons Enoch and Sābi, whom they considered as the founders of their faith. This was the principal religion of the Ara-ians before Muslimism, and is one of those tolerated by the Qur'an on paying a tribute to the prophet and his successors.

▲ صُفِي Safī or Sufī, The surname of a dynasty of Persian kings (who reigned from about the year 1500 till the usurpation of Nādir Shāh in 1736), so named from Ismael Safi, the first monarch of this house. The origin of the elevation of this family however must be traced to a private ancestor of that prince, called صُفِي الدِّين safīyū'd dīn, (the purity of religion), who was cotemporary with Tamerlane. He resided at Ardabil, in Media; where his reputation for virtue was so high, that he was visited by that conqueror, as Diogenes was formerly by Alexander. Tamerlane on this occasion was so charmed with his conversation, that desiring him to ask any thing in his power to grant, the sage pointed to a number of young Karmānian captives (whom this scourge of mankind, according to custom, meant to sacrifice on the first public festivity), and requested their liberty: they were immediately delivered to him as slaves; but the generous philosopher, furnishing them with every thing necessary, sent them free to their native country. As they were of the first families in Karmānia, their sense of his benevolence found no bounds; they were constant in their attentions, and magnificent in their gifts; a respect little short of adoration was paid to him; and it was chiefly owing at length to the attachment and courage of the descendants of those grateful Karmānians that his posterity mounted the Persian throne. Safīy, Pure, clear, bright. Just, upright, sincere. The best part (of any thing). That part of the plunder which a general takes to himself before a division. (A camel) plentiful in milk.
